@Observer: I respect your wishes to help lift the Philippines from it's current, poverty stricken state - I really do. And I too share your lofty dreams of eliminating rampant corruption in our poor country. I say bravo to you for having those ideals. However, I do not share the view that "Kung Walang Corrupt, Walang Mahirap". That would be naive - Even the richest countries in this world has it's share of the poor and the unfortunate... Solving the problem of corruption does not automatically solve the problem of poverty. I pity our poor, if all Sen. Aquino has planned out for them is a meaningless catch phrase. Even more naive (if not outright quixotic) is to think that any candidate - once voted into power, will suddenly become the messiah of massive change. Moreso if said candidate has done nothing in the past towards that goal, whilst having every opportunity to do so. Here is a Reality I want you to Check: (Scientifically Based even). According to Newton's 1st Law of Motion: "A body at rest tends to stay at rest and a body in motion tends to stay in motion" Guess who those bodies are?
