{xtypo_quote} When we've been here ten thousand years ... bright shining as the sun. We've no less days to sing God's praise ... then when we've first begun. – The last lines of the ‘Amazing Grace’ hymn. {/xtypo_quote}

The classic hymn, “Amazing Grace,” is more-often than not sung in Christian memorial services or funerals. My father, Dominador S. Reyes, a former soldier, asked me once at the funeral of his wartime comrade, a retired U. S. Army physician, after he heard the hymn: “Who will remember the soldiers like me when we are gone – even for a few of those 10,000 years?”

I told my Dad that since he has a son who finished journalism, I would write a classic biography when he would have gone to the Blue Yonder. I assured him that for as long as it is published online, people will read it and remember his great military service to the Philippines and the United States during World War II.

When my Dad went to the Great Beyond on Jan. 10, 1999, I finalized the manuscript that I have been working on in my computer and turned it to a eulogy. Casting modesty aside, I believe that very-few descendants can duplicate what I did in remembering and honoring an elder because I have the gift of a modest, ahem, wordsmith. Then I recalled my training as an altar boy in Sorsogon Province and as a student of schools run by the secular priests, the SVD Fathers, the Benedictines and the Jesuits. I have learned from my religious mentors the concept of “living forever,” as stated by Jesus Christ (as found in the Gospel). Christ said: “I am the bread that came down from heaven. The person that eats this bread will live forever,” while he was teaching in a synagogue in Capernaum (John 6:59).

People have always been preoccupied by a search for the Fountain of Youth. To the clergy, the number-one (if not, the only) path to “immortality” is for Christians to continue living morally-upright existence, possibly by following in the footsteps of their Lord and Redeemer. It is existence until the end of time in the Next Life, in Heaven or in the Great Beyond.

But in this modern world, there are no more pharaohs that can build pyramids or emperors that can construct coliseums or palaces or great walls – infrastructures that can secure for them “immortality.” And those monuments have not even lasted for 10,000 years. Not yet.

Even with the advances in science, technology, nutrition and medicine, mortals can only hope to live not more-than 30-years longer than the average life span.

“Simmortality”

Since my father’s death in 1999, I kept brainstorming on how community leaders, civic workers and even ordinary laymen could obtain what I dubbed “a semblance of immortality.” Or for short, “Simmortality,” as I coined it.

In 2007, this writer proposed to a Pomona, California-based agency of the New York Life to launch what he called the “Philippine Immortality Project.” These articles were written about it:

The Pomona-based insurance agency did not provide any much-needed support as a corporate sponsor to the plan of promoting the “Simmortality” Project by insuring the lives of community leaders, with the insurance proceeds either payable to their often tax-exempt American-registered associations or their alma mater in the Philippines or the United States to create a “Students’ Loan Fund (SLF)” or another charitable endeavor. I, therefore, unilaterally ended the corporate tie-up with the said agency.

The “SLF” would virtually create a “semblance of immortality” on the part of the person insured because it would be replenished by the borrowers after they have graduated, get employed and started earning salaries and other remuneration from employers. For as long as the “SLF” remains funded, the memory of the insured community leader or Overseas Filipino would be remembered, as it has become a legacy bequeathed to the insured’s alma mater or chosen educational institution in the Philippines or the United States.

In March this year, Paul P. Villar, a friend of this writer, called to say that he has been recruited by a bigger Irvine, California-based agency of the New York Life. Mr. Villar said that he discussed it with his immediate supervisor at the agency and he was authorized to revive the “Simmortality” Project and make a go of it – with the right corporate support.

Testing the Project Among this Writer’s Fellow Bicolnons

The project proponent hopes to test the concept among his fellow Bicolnons who have migrated to the United States.

The plan now is to launch formally the “Simmortality” Project at the induction of the Bikol U.S.A. of the Midwest on Friday

day, May 13, 2011
, at Four Points by Sheraton at 10249 Irving Park, Illinois.
